

Listening to situated textuality

Working on differentiated public voices

Lynette Hunter University of Leeds

Feminist
Copyright
SAGE Publ
(1
Thousand C and Nev
vol. 2(2): 21
[146
(2001)
205-217; C

Abstract Ethics is enabling of agency, but also normative and conventional. At the moment a gendered ethics, or the gendering of ethics, is a helpful approach because it is concerned with issues to do with people often peripheral to and excluded from power. At the moment it can work to keep ethics responsive, but how do we halt the drift into the normative, both as prescriptive and as ideological? A feminist ethics maintains the responsive and undermines prescriptive categories, and is committed to involving disempowered voices in the conversation. The article is particularly concerned with the articulation of the situated, and raises questions about attending to, learning how to listen to and learning how to speak, so that many people from different places can get involved in ethics. Otherwise ethics isn't ethical.

keywords democracy, ethics, feminism, knowledge, narrative

The discussion in this article is about something quite simple: for me, ethics is not a set of standards, it is about talking, discussing and negotiating over grounds that we come to agree on in order to make decisions and take actions. As someone who works on rhetoric, or persuasion, what I am trained to do is look at how we agree to grounds and to some extent make decisions, and I am particularly interested in looking at whether the way we do this has any effect on the actions we take. Any connection between the agreement and the actions is going to be rooted in the historical and social, and it is often difficult to discern what it might be.

Ethics is a two-edged sword, both responsive and engaging, enabling of agency but also normative and conventional. At the moment a gendered ethics, or the gendering of ethics, is a helpful approach because it is concerned with issues to do with people often peripheral to and excluded from power. At the moment it can work to keep ethics responsive, but how do we halt the drift into the normative, both as prescriptive and as ideological?<sup>1</sup> A feminist ethics for me is first of all one that maintains the responsive and undermines prescriptive categories, and, second, one that is committed to involving disempowered voices in the conversation. Even though much work on gender and ethics or a feminist ethics is concerned with the implications of these strategies, it is precisely the voices of the disempowered that ideologies deny, and that still cannot be heard in mainstream communication. I know from my own work with various communities that many people speak but cannot be heard; the words walk silently past their ears. So I would like to raise questions about attending to, learning how to listen to and learning how to speak so that many people from different places can get involved in ethics. Otherwise ethics isn't ethical.

---

Recent work on ethics works across the supposed split between epistemological and materialist approaches to gender and ethics: the epistemologically based ethics puts pressure on the way canonical ethics excludes so many people, and that materialist ethics focuses on substantive values such as trust, care and empathy (Bubeck, 1998; Walker, 1998: 17f). Bringing together these two traditions is vital for a situated ethics, an ethics based in specific practices. By 'situated' I intend the kind of work we do in fairly small communities or groups of people, which are often quite intimate, where we hammer out ways of living together and talking about events that mean a lot to us, but for which we often have no words and no way of communicating (see Lovibond, 1983). This is quite different work from what we do when we take up subject positions within nation-state ideology, or when we work discursively to challenge or oppose those positions and try to shift them. Neither of these activities acknowledges the situated and local as a primary context for ethical work, because they are both anchored conceptually to metaphysical presence and its universals that make up the representative base of those positions. Of course a situated practice is contingent to the others, as they are to it, but it is still quite different because of its focus on difference rather than on the similarity conveyed by universal representations (see Hunter, 1999a: chapters 1, 5 and 6). The situated practice of working on words is what I signify by the word 'articulation'.

There is a remarkable consistency in what people are trying to do with the situated practice of ethics. The central impetus comes from recognizing the diversity and plurality of access to ethical debate as opposed to the restricted and self-selecting basis of canonical ethics (Code et al., 1999: 15–23). Many people are trying to find alternatives to normative ethical standards based on a priori grounds, claiming absolute truth or at least neutrality: an ethics traditionally with selective access, restrictive practices and the concept of 'rights', and offering profoundly inappropriate representation to everyone else. Instead, the alternatives are trying to develop an ethics not based on a rhetoric of similitude but on one of difference (Behabib, 1992; Young, 1997: 38–59). Rather than tolerating or hiding elements that do not 'fit', a rhetoric of difference involves negotiating procedures that move toward sharing some values, respecting others, as well as the possibility of personal change.

Political theory and philosophy is another area concerned with the issues, probably because politics and ethics are completely intertwined and not only with each other but also with rhetoric. We can't have one without the other two.<sup>2</sup> Recent work in politics has been spurred into action by the same impetus – the diversity and number of people who can now claim access to democracy – and political theorists have been looking at the implications for the nation-state democracies many of us live in and the kinds of citizenship and problems of representation that have resulted (Walby, 1992). Particularly interesting are the strategies for deliberative democracy, offering modes of participation which, in common with many ethicists dealing with gender, indicate that one way of including people who are conventionally excluded is by providing different ways that they can be heard, and by listening to the different modes of communication they use (Benhabib, 1996a). This kind of political theory and ethics work, both often impelled by gender issues, especially the way gendered communities have been excluded from discussion for so long, point to narrative, anecdote, story, autobiography, analogy and other similar genres, and claim their rhetorical efficacy for inclusion.

The rest of this article is concerned first to problematize this claim; second to consider a particular rhetorical event – the drift from the responsive to the normative; third to think about ways in which different voices can be listened to and included in the political and ethical conversation; and finally to question the impact of the global – given that political theorizing gains impetus from the sudden shift in access to power in nation-states and given the focus on small communities in ethics.

Problematizing theories of deliberative democracy

The argument, as we well know by now, runs something like this: that democratic structures of social contract liberal humanism were established for a small, relatively coherent group of propertied, white Christian men. Their singular achievement, to deflect the physical destruction of a militaristic culture into the controlled aggression of capitalism, went hand in hand with national imperialism and the growth of state institutions, and in England with the party political system of oppositionality which is inherently conservative. What happens from the 19th to the 20th centuries when a large number of nations extend the franchise is that there are suddenly many different interest groups, with many radically different needs, claiming political, social and cultural power. One answer has been proportional representation, and there are other attempts at resolving the anomalies that arise. But ‘democracy’ has frequently not answered this challenge, with the result of civil unrest, overthrows, coups and revolutions.

The writing of Seyla Benhabib and others with whom she has worked is particularly helpful here in combining procedural democratic strategies with substantive issues (Gould, 1990: 272; Mansbridge, 1996: 48) into a ‘responsive’ universalism (Benhabib, 1995: 339). To encourage the procedural aspect of ongoing engagement, many writers have been concerned to elaborate the idea of ‘differentiated public spaces’ (Habermas, 1995), in other words claiming that public space is not only institutional, governmental space, but also for example environmental (Benhabib, 1996a: 87) or ecological – it can involve Parent-Teacher Associations, trade unions, voluntary women’s communities (Mansbridge, 1996: 56), healthcare providers (Cohen, 1993: 147) and so on. These are places where people who are motivated by concern but not necessarily trained in formal debate other institutional techniques can go to discuss, argue through specific issues, find ways of articulating their concerns, and eventually put them larger policy-making bodies. These spaces allow for the practice of a situated ethics. Habermas terms similar public space 'civil society' (197) Nancy Fraser (1992: 121) calls it 'subaltern counterpublics'. In these kind of public spaces a well-argued position can gain a hold, give legitimacy to the group and make it easier for it to be heard next time around (Cohen 1993: 156).

I agree that this aspect of deliberative democracy is a helpful strategy even though it is energy expensive and puts enormous pressure on small groups to justify themselves. But it raises another question: institutional structures are almost always ethically normative. These days there are intriguing 'ethics committees' to deal with the problems that normative raises in places such as the British Medical Association or even the British civil service. So how does a small group using situated ethics interact with an institutional structure with normative ethics? The whole point about the former is responsiveness and ongoing engagement, and the defining feature of the latter is corporate stability. This leads to my second concern that from this perspective every situated articulation has to be partially normalized before it can become politically effective (Wolin, 1996: 43–4), and the moment it does so it becomes co-opted out of the responsive.

The drift from the responsive to the normative

Central to the procedural or ongoing aspects of deliberative democracy are words and phrases such as 'narrative' (Code, 1995: 155; Young, 1996: 60–74), 'dialogue' (Cohen, 1990: 89), 'expression' (Lovibond, 1983), 'articulation' (Mouffe and Laclau, 1985: 113).<sup>3</sup> To deal with the last because it is different in kind from the other three, Mouffe and Laclau use the word 'articulation' in a manner different to my own because they locate its work within 'discourse'. They seem unconcerned with any activity that occurs outside of hegemony, yet elsewhere (Mouffe and Laclau, 1985: 135–6) they seem to allow for both 'antagonism' and 'articulation' to occur without hegemony. The agonistic rhetoric of their political theory claims that co-optation into the normative is inevitable, as does the later development that theory concerned with consensus communication is a threat to democracy (Mouffe, 1993: 6). However rhetoric is not inevitably agonistic. In other places negotiation and responsive engagement do not inevitably involve 'force'. Rhetoric was developed precisely as a system to distinguish among different kinds of persuasion, forceful and not (Hunter, 2000), and I do not find it helpful to place physical coercion and intimidation on the same scale as responsive negotiation. The former will always insist that it is right, whereas the latter will always entertain the possibility of change or at the very least of agreeing to differ.

At the same time, the other three examples each beg the question of how a situated need is translated into articulation and how it can resist being normalized into the discursive and hegemonic, let alone the subjective and representational, when it does so. Some political theory has claimed that story or narrative or even rhetoric in themselves resist co-optation (Walker, 1998: 66; Young, 1997: 60–74). But, as rhetoricians have always argued, whether a strategy is more or less likely to be co-opted is to do with historical particularities (Code, 1995: 60; Hunter, 1999a: 162–76). Margaret Walker's insights in her extensive discussion of narrative collaboration (Walker, 1998: 112–27), which produces a self that is a 'layered, nested, and "ensemble subjectivity"' (Walker, 1998: 117), may not have been co-opted in the reception of the 'slave narratives' to which she refers (Walker, 1998: 127). However, the production of any kind of subjectivity indicates that co-optation has occurred.

Recently Iris Young has argued that there are discursive modes that can resist co-optation, and a strong argument against such a possibility has been put by Seyla Benhabib. However, Benhabib's arguments fall short of understanding the historical specificity of each mode. She addresses the suggestion from Young that 'story-telling', rhetoric and 'greeting' are possible models of resistance, and asks: first, what happens if we don't understand the story? I would answer that not understanding is a valuable first step in recognizing differences we have to work on; the danger of story lies far more in its normative power. Second, Benhabib finds greeting too affective, yet, as Young notes, greeting involves the whole etiquette of valuing others, respecting them, showing care toward them. And finally, Benhabib's criticism of rhetoric deals with only a few aspects of its technique and not at all with its strategies and stances. For example, she argues against it because 'it induces people to engage in certain courses of action rather than others', yet goes on to state that we need 'a discursive language that appeals to commonly shared and accepted public reasons' like 'the rule of law'. Not only do the criticism and the approbation sound similar, but the structure of the rule of law is precisely a form of judicial rhetoric.

Although I do not think that Young is aware enough of the historical constraints on the modes she proposes, I would agree with her that the rational and argumentative, agonistic forms of the debate (elsewhere commended by Benhabib, 1996a: 76) are usually learned in privileged situations. Therefore they privilege certain people over others, and put in place a restrictive practice that inexorably makes normative other modes of articulation. If we could find a way of validating non-rational logics or structures, a lot of people currently excluded from participating in political and public discussion would find it more accessible and would be able to contribute, and we could start dealing with difference as a resource and not as an obstacle.

The normative as a coercive stance

As Nancy Fraser suggests in the context of politics, we cannot simply turn to a set of communicative devices and offer them as solutions to the issue of articulation (Fraser, 1992: 119, 121). For example, Julie Cruikshank, who has worked for many years with Yukon women in northwestern Canada, speaks of the way that story-telling is a legitimate and valued way of organizing political action. She also notes that the same strategies are beginning to play a role in larger policy debates (Cruikshank, 1998: xv), times in an attempt to manipulate and control. When mediated to southern Canada by television, these attempts may seem successful, convincing those viewers that the politicians are trying hard to understand the northern constituents, and this is a not inconsiderable political achievement itself. However, the structure of oral story-telling in the north is so complex and culturally specific that, among northern viewers, the politicians (happily) seem naive and opportunistic.

A less happy example is told by Beverly Sauer, a writer who researches ethics and rhetoric in business communications. She tells (Sauer, 1993) the way that the widows of men killed in a Kentucky mining disaster in 1981 formed their own response in the aftermath to what the company should do. The account also includes a lucid analysis of the institution's report on the disaster, and how its narrative privileges industry assumptions about risk and safety, and in the process obscures the lines of authority and responsibility. More important are her conclusions about the women's words themselves. She points out that the women had their own standards for judging danger, and among a number of examples quotes Jewelene Centers:

When Tommy worked at Irishman, he never came home as tired or dirty or upset as he did when he worked for Adkins Coal Co. While he worked for Adkins, constantly kept a headache, and he couldn't even walk across the floor without leaving a trail of coal dust. He told me he had to find another job because the company just didn't care about the men's safety and it was too dangerous to work there. (Sauer, 1993: 74)

Sauer continues by noting that the women also had their own domestic evidence for the causes of the disaster, and quotes Annis Ashley:

Dillary [Ashley] would come home filthy from the mines, and his work clothes always required two or three wash cycles to get all the coal dust out of them. . . And had the mines been properly rock dusted the explosion would never have happened. (Sauer, 1993: 74)

The analysis that follows concludes that the recommendations that the women put forward as a result of their discussions were well grounded and clear, but that because they challenged the assumption that individuals caused accidents they were not heard. Sauer cites several elements:

- 1) The women lacked elements of credibility including technical expertise, favourable reputation, corporate status, values similar to the corporate reader, and rhetorical techniques that would have coded the position as understanding, well informed, carefully organized, articulate and fair minded in that reader's view.
- 2) The women were excluded from power structures that control discourse in the ongoing daily work of the mine.
- 3) The conventions of discourse from which they were excluded maintained power structures, such as the use of the passive voice.
- 4) The women to some extent internalized these power structures and depreciated the value of their own testimony.

---

The report from the women used a discourse that is 'inarticulate, unstructured, and unobjective, but like Cassandra, they speak the truth in the face of agreement addiction' (Sauer, 1993: 79). Nevertheless, their lack of credibility means that they were silenced and excluded.

Sauer herself offers a clarified, normative list of the women's recommendations to show how helpful it would have been. And certainly, if the women had adapted their response and understandings to institutional discourse, they would have added much to the report. However, it is unlikely that if they had set out to produce a normative report they could have made the recommendations they did. They would probably have recognized the 'triviality' of measuring ppm (parts per million) of dust in laundry washes and so on, and may well not even have got to the point of articulating any of their ideas. Situated work often doesn't know what it will say until it is said. The women's speech does not lack value; it simply needs other ears. Sauer can hear; she is trained as a feminist to do so. But she is also publishing in a journal that addresses a large community of normative readers, and as a result the article talks explicitly about why the women's recommendations failed rather than about the positives in the syntax, vocabulary, grammar and structure.

Situated ethics do not become normative simply under institutional pressure. A well-recognized rhetorical drift frequently occurs, and for good reason. Situated practices take energy, time and commitment, and if another case arrives that looks similar to one in the past, and if we have fewer resources, then we are likely to work by analogy and to try the past strategy on the present case. If that works, we may be led inevitably into repetition until someone shouts and screams that it's not appropriate for them – and then they are lucky if we hear them because we may have lost the skill of listening to that voice. Perhaps the situated articulation is forever lost to larger groups? Conceptually perhaps we need to recognize that the 'situated' is precisely that. Once 'heard', the situation is different. But, most urgent, I think we have to resist the pull into thinking of the interaction between large and small political publics as one in which the situated ethics is engaging with another system that has 'normative' as a need. The normative is not a need, it's a stance that underwrites coercive stability, that maintains the shift to the inexorably normative terrain of state structures and policies, which make the situated impossible. As Seyla Benhabib notes, treating someone in accordance with norms is to treat them as a 'generalized' other, while to recognize and confirm someone as 'a concrete, individual being with specific needs, talents and capacities' (Benhabib, 1992: 281) is to treat them with friendship, love and care. The 'concrete other' signifies 'the unthought, the unseen, and the unheard' in normative theories (Benhabib, 1992: 281).

Listening to and including different voices

It is not enough to have a differentiated public space that produces that initial articulation; we need differentiated public voices with rhetorical strategies to maintain the situated articulation and we need more responsive reading and listening strategies to ensure they can be heard. But given the difficulty of being effective, finding a way of being 'heard', without becoming normative, or at least losing situatedness, how can the particularity of situated voices enter discourse? A large part of the answer lies in education. We still live with an education system that was initiated by white, male, Christian and propertied people, and we have been educated to listen to the situations appropriate to them. I am not suggesting that these situations are without value, but in practical terms it is impossible to learn to listen to the situated particularities of everyone, so we need to make choices about where we will direct our energy.

An analogy can be made with the resistant voice – one that has informed poetics for centuries and by definition resists the normative. Despite the proportional relation between resistance and size of audience – the more the text resists convention, the smaller the audience – people seem always to have recognized the value of training ourselves to engage with resistant words and practices, either resisting subjectivity or engaging in the discursive challenge – neither of which are to do with articulating but with the recognition that an articulation of something previously unheard has taken place. Although most engagement has hitherto been with poetics produced by privileged people, there is no reason why we should not carry out this kind of reading for voices that are different. It would require learning how to listen as a resistant practice within a personal and situated context appropriate to ourselves, and all of us cannot do it for all voices. But we can do it for some. Which voices we work with depends on situated practice, time, energy and commitment.

However, resistant work may not be enough: we may well need not only to counter the representations in place in discursive systems but attempt to value the articulations on which we work while we work on them. Situated practice on texts will not take place with a focus on either hegemony or indeed ideology. Ethical feminist practice must know the situation of the text appropriately, and hence its epistemological strategies must be prepared to work outside of hegemonic plausibilities (Code et al., 1991: 15). Or, as Daryl Koehn (1998) puts it, for feminism to better carry out respect for an ethic of care and trust, it must not limit itself to identifying specific issues, but engage in a dialogical interaction with the situation by which an interaction of respect for difference seems to be signified.<sup>4</sup> I have spoken elsewhere about Marilyn Frye's concept of 'hearing each other into speech' and will quote again her salient description:

It is speaking unspoken facts and feelings, unburying the data of our lives. But as the naming occurs, each woman's speech creating context for the other's, the data of our experience reveal patterns both within the experience of one woman and among the experiences of several women. The experiences of each woman and the women collectively generate a new web of meaning. (Frye, 1993: 107)

An example from my own work might be the book Footprints by MAMA/ the East African women's group in Sheffield made up largely of Somali refugees. Their previous book, Shells on a Woven Cord, was a collection of stories about where they draw their strength from in a war-torn, divided brutal life. Footprints is a more integrated attempt to speak to their surrounding society and offer the difference of their lives in England. The book is a combination of oral story-telling and graphic form, and is doing a number of complex things. But superficially it is a recipe book interspersed with stories. Recipes are considered a lowly form of writing,<sup>5</sup> the English language used is not standard and is interrupted with Somali words, and the book is illustrated: all semiotic indications that this is not a 'valuable' text. But there is exceptionally subtle manoeuvring through the language, a dislocation of expectation, and there are demanding formal properties. Sometimes these are as simple as injecting lyric into technical instruction (MAMA, 2000: 25), and at other times they ask for a reading that reads across the normative in a wholehearted way (MAMA, 2000: 46–59). Yet the notion of 'difficulty' and difference is countered by situating the texts in discussions of food and other domestic matters.

I have permission to quote one section in full:

Recipe for Leaving a Rude Husband

Remember the proverb 'silic ku nool sgaal nin guursataa dhaanta.' Better marry nine than put up with the insults and abuses of one

Never doubt yourself

Drink more coffee in honour of your Sar

Sing yourself a song, 'I see a footprint in the grains'

Tell him, 'my shoes are strong'

'my shoes are ready'

'the path in front stretches'

'my shoes are at the door step'

'I am standing with my toes'

Tie a robe around your waist

Take enough sahay, food, to tie to the faraq, tassels

Take your first stride

Don't look back

Quicken your pace

You never know what's ahead of you

(MAMA, 2000: 47)

Can this voice be 'heard' outside of a situated practice? Does it need to be? In some instances I think it does need to be; whether it can be is another question. It requires a slow process of education, recognition and acquiring of legitimization – Shells on a Woven Cord received the Raymond Williams prize for community writing. As it does so it moves into the discursive as a commodity, but its textuality can remain situated as it opens up an area of engagement and hence value for other people.

In my own teaching area there is still a consensus about canonical literary value, and a poor understanding of why it may be important. There is also an enormous resistance to taking alternative writing and speaking seriously. Literary critics seem happy to deal with 'popular culture', the content, but not with the rhetoric of the text and how that both engage value and constructs legitimacy. There has been slow progress with diaries, letters and journals, yet they are still peripheral, and I suspect the progress will be even slower with writing more distanced from the normative and representational. But educators have an ethical responsibility to articulate the value of these texts or their value will slip away, not get circulated and read (Hunter, 1999a: 162). And what we value becomes thin and confined and does not extend out and inform other ways of life. We need to find ways to recognize and agree to accord value, to repeat that value in textual action which is the acquiring of agency.

---

Coda: the impact of the global

I would like to end with a brief note on how the interaction among situatedness, discursivity and subjectivity may be changing in the face of globalization. Globalization is impelled by capitalism and the identification and exploitation of specific markets, just as nationalism was before it in imperial desire. As globalization recognizes more and diverse markets, the differently situated constituencies will need to be recognized with the state. This is a cynical view, but also points up the probability that many of the constituencies will not provide viable markets and will find legitimation even harder. It seems to me that the problem here is that we need to resist the analogy between the state and the situated today, and the private citizen and the wife in earlier times, otherwise situated practice in the wife's position analogically, will become the silent exploited mainstay of the nation. This may already be an element in certain practices of multiculturalism.

If ethics has always described a potentially responsive stance, it has conventionally been articulated and disseminated by a small select group of privileged people. What is new for us now is size. The sheer number and diversity of people engaging in ethical debate is huge; the potential effect of decisions is enormous and the responsibilities are of a different scale. The franchise posed questions of size concerning access and representation for ethics, globalization, and particularly global finance and economic issues. It poses questions of size in terms of obligations and rights and responsibilities, and the internet media pose questions of size in terms of how we arrive at agreed grounds and what stances we take up in terms of how we wish to interact with larger audiences.

The last time anything of this scale happened in England at least was in the 16th to 17th centuries, when there were similar changes in the constituency of people claiming access to power. As globalization makes states negotiate in different ways, they will have to become more responsive and less fixed, albeit temporarily; and as nation-states are placed into specific positions, they will need to resist that positioning. If, in the 17th century, nation-state ideology was generated out of and imposed on civic and regional power, nations may find ways of responding to the generation of global ideology by turning to ongoing civic strategies, but the energy of such discursive resistance will come from the situated. So there is hope in this comparison since solutions were found for that change, although every hope comes with a warning since the solutions for the nation-state brought their own problems. Hope, like situated work, is often only recognized in retrospect.

---

Notes

1. See Hunter (1999a: chapter 1) for a detailed study of ideological strategies.
2. See Code et al. (1991) for the proposal that the merging of ethics and the political is a particularly feminist approach.
3. Mouffe and Laclau use the word 'articulation' in a manner different to my own because they locate its work within 'discourse' and seem unconcerned with any activity that occurs outside of hegemony. However, on pages 135–6 they seem to allow for both 'antagonism' and 'articulation' to occur without hegemony.
4. See Hunter (1999b) for a discussion of the difficulties with the word 'dialogical' among feminist writers.
5. Not only are they considered lowly, but study of them is also frequently dismissed, as I found while coordinating the research on bibliographies of domestic books during the 1980s and early 1990s.

References

- Benhabib, Seyla (1991) Situating the Self. London: Routledge.
- Benhabib, Seyla (1992) 'The Generalized and the Concrete Other', pp. 267–300 in E.J. Hornsby Frazer and S. Lovibond (eds) Ethics: A Feminist Reader. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Benhabib, Seyla (1995) 'Communicative Ethics and Current Controversies in Practical Philosophy', pp. 330–70 in Seyla Benhabib and Fred Dallmeyer (eds) The Communicative Ethics Controversy. London: MIT Press.
- Benhabib, Seyla (1996a) 'Toward a Deliberative Model of Democratic Legitimacy', pp. 67–94 in Seyla Benhabib (ed.) Democracy and Difference: Contesting the Boundaries of the Political. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Benhabib, Seyla, ed. (1996b) Democracy and Difference: Contesting the Boundaries of the Political. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Benhabib, Seyla and Fred Dallmeyer, eds (1995) The Communicative Ethics Controversy. London: MIT Press.
- Bubeck, Keimut (1998) 'Ethic of Care and Feminist Ethics', Women's Philosophy Review 19 (spring): 22–50.
- Calhoun, Craig, ed. (1992) Habermas and the Public Sphere. London: MIT Press.
- Code, Lorraine (1995) Rhetorical Spaces: Essays on Gendered Locations. London: Routledge.
- Code, Lorraine, M. Ford, K. Martindale, S. Shewin and D. Shogan (1991) Is Feminist Ethics Possible? Ottawa: Canadian Research Institute: Association Women/ICREF.
- Cohen, Jean (1990) 'Discourse Ethics and Civil Society', pp. 83–109 in David Rasmussen (ed.) Universalism v. Communitarianism: Contemporary Debates in Ethics. London: MIT Press.

- Cohen, Joshua (1993) 'Moral Pluralism and Political Consensus', pp. 270–91 in David Copp, Jean Hampton and John Roemer (eds) The Idea of Democracy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cohen, Joshua and J. Rogers (1994) 'Solidarity, Democracy, Association', pp. 136–59 in W. Streeck (ed.) Staat und Verbands, Politisches Vierteljahresschrift. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag.
- Copp, David, Jean Hampton and Roger Roemer, eds (1993) The Idea of Democracy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cruikshank, Julie (1998) The Social Life of Stories: Narrative and Knowledge in the Yukon Territory. Vancouver: UBC Press.
- Fraser, Nancy (1992) 'Rethinking the Public Sphere: A Continuation of the Critique of Actually Existing Democracy', pp. 109–42 in Craig Calhoun (ed.) Habermas and the Public Sphere. London: MIT Press.
- Frazer, E., J. Hornsby and S. Lovibond (1992) Ethics: A Feminist Reader. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Frye, Marilyn (1993) 'The Possibility of Feminist Theory', pp. 103–10 in Alison Jaggar and P. Rothenburg (eds) Feminist Frameworks: Alternative Theoretical Accounts of the Relations between Women and Men. London: McGraw Hill.
- Gould, Carol (1988) Rethinking Democracy: Freedom and Social Cooperation in Politics, Economy, and Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gould, Carol (1990) 'On the Conception of the Common Interest: Between Procedure and Substance', pp. 253–73 in Michael Kelly (ed.) Hermeneutic and Critical Theory in Ethics and Politics. London: MIT Press.
- Habermas, Jürgen (1973) Theory and Practice, trans. J. Viertel. Boston, MA: Beacon Press.
- Habermas, Jürgen (1995) 'Three Normative Models of Democracy', pp. 21–30 in Seyla Benhabib and Fred Dallmeyer (eds) The Communicative Ethics Controversy. London: MIT Press.
- Hunter, Lynette (1999a) Critiques of Knowing: Situated Textualities in Science Computing and the Arts. London: Routledge.
- Hunter, Lynette (1999b) 'Civic Rhetoric 1560–1640', pp. 88–105 in F. Ames-Lewis (ed.) Sir Thomas Gresham and Gresham College: Studies in the Intellectual History of London in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Hunter, Lynette (2000) 'Considering Issues of Rhetoric and Violence', Parallax 6(2): 2–8.
- Jaggar, Alison, ed. (1994) Living with Contradictions: Controversies in Feminist Social Ethics. Oxford: Westview Press.
- Jaggar, Alison and P. Rothenburg, eds (1993) Feminist Frameworks: Alternative Theoretical Accounts of the Relations between Women and Men. London: McGraw Hill.
- Kelly, Michael (1990) Hermeneutics and Critical Theory in Ethics and Politics. London: MIT Press.
- Koehn, Daryl (1998) Rethinking Feminist Ethics: Care, Trust and Empathy. London: Routledge.
- Lovibond, Sabina (1983) Realism and Imagination in Ethics. Oxford: Blackwell.
- MAMA (1995) Shells on a Woven Cord. Sheffield: MAMA and Yorkshire Arts Circus.

-
- MAMA (2000) Footprint: Recipes for Life (ed. Amina Souleiman). Leeds: Peepal Tree Press.
- Mansbridge, Jane (1996) 'Using Power/Fighting Power: The Polity', pp. 46–66 in Seyla Benhabib (ed.) Democracy and Difference: Contesting the Boundaries of the Political. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Mouffe, Chantal (1993) The Return of the Political. London: Verso.
- Mouffe, Chantal and Ernesto Laclau (1985) Hegemony and Socialist Strategy: Towards a Radical Democratic Politics (trans. W. Moore and P. Cammack). London: Verso.
- Rasmussen, David, ed. (1990) Universalism v. Communitarianism: Contemporary Debates in Ethics. London: MIT Press.
- Sauer, Beverly (1993) 'Sense and Sensibility in Technical Documentation: How Feminist Interpretation Strategies Can Save Lives in the Nation's Mines', Journal of Business and Technical Communication 7(1): 63–83.
- Walby, Sylvia (1992) 'Woman and Nation', International Journal of Comparative Sociology 33(1–2): 81–100.
- Walker, Margaret (1998) Moral Understandings: A Feminist Study in Ethics. London: Routledge.
- Wolin, Sheldon (1996) 'Fugitive Democracy', pp. 31–45 in Seyla Benhabib (ed.) Democracy and Difference: Contesting the Boundaries of the Political. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Young, Iris (1997) Intersecting Voices: Dilemmas of Gender, Political Philosophy, and Policy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Lynette Hunter is professor of the history of rhetoric at the University of Leeds. She has published in the fields of critical theory, feminism, literary criticism, rhetoric, and the history and philosophy of science. A particular focus for her research at the moment is the legitimation and valuing of ways of using the verbal arts among communities that have had limited access to conventional discourses of power. Her books include Rhetorical Space, Modern Allegory and Fantasy, Outsider Notes (Talonbooks, 1997) and Critiques of Knowing (Routledge, 1999).

Address: University of Leeds, Leeds LS2 9JT, UK.
Email: 113073.561@compuserve.com

S
I
G
N
S

Journal of Women in Culture and Society
<http://www.journals.uchicago.edu/Signs>

Edited by Sandra Harding and Kathryn Norberg, UCLA

The leading international journal in women's studies, Signs has been publishing articles from a wide range of disciplines in a variety of voices for nearly three decades. Now, under its new editorship, Signs seeks to renew debate and discussion with more groundbreaking, provocative articles while staying true to its prestigious reputation.

In addition to major essays on gender, race, culture, class, nation, and sexuality, Signs brings to its readers in-depth book reviews, special issues and sections, and "U.S. and International Notes" to provide a forum for lively debate.

In addition to its diverse inquiry, Signs provides:

- Innovative Perspectives

Signs encourages new methods of scholarship, analysis, and interpretation—articles that contest and reconfigure such founding terms as woman, culture, feminist, race, and nation.

- Distinctive Attractions

In addition to major articles, Signs publishes in-depth book reviews, review essays, fora, and special reports to stimulate analysis and cogent debate.

- Excellent Value

Your subscription to Signs ensures that you will have access to some of the most significant debates in women's studies—debates at the intersections of gender, race, culture, class, nation, and sexuality—all at reasonable rates.

Published quarterly by The University of Chicago Press. Regular one-year subscription rates: Individuals $38.00; Students $27.00; NWSA members $31.00; Institutions $140.00. Outside USA, please add $6.00 for postage. Canadian residents, please add postage and 7% GST. Visa and MasterCard payments are accepted. To order, send check, purchase order, or complete credit card information (acct. #, exp. date, phone number, and signature) to the address below. Credit card customers may fax their orders to (773) 753-0811 or e-mail them to journal-orders@press.uchicago.edu.

The University of Chicago Press

Journals Division, SF15A, P.O. Box 37005, Chicago, IL 60637 USA

Order online at <http://www.journals.uchicago.edu/Signs/>